NAVIGATING THE OPPORTUNITY ZONE

By Adam Bledsoe, Broker

In recent months, the pace of conversation surrounding Opportunity Zones has accelerated, and as with any new tax law, questions lead to more questions. After being party to a few panels with real “pros” in the OZ world, here are a few things we now know, and a few others that remain cloudy.

ASPECTS CLARIFIED

Exclusion is the name of the game. If a Qualified Opportunity Fund (QOF) is created and held for at least 10 years, any gains by appreciation are then exempt from tax. The law also has provisions for deferral of tax liability and incremental steps-up in basis, but the exclusion provision is by far the most lucrative incentive.

Entity Type – QOFs must be either a partnership or corporation. Single member LLCs are not eligible.

Complexity and Cost – QOF investing is complicated. Without elaborating, it’s fair to say that QOF investors will be incurring significant CPA and legal fees in order to meet quarterly IRS “tests.”

Effect on RE Values – “Will OZs cause inflated prices?” Professionals overwhelmingly answer, “no.” Investing via QOF will not turn a bad deal into a good deal. There are significant capital improvement costs involved, and procedural costs are uncertain.

Timing – The program begins to sunset at the end of 2019. A QOF is eligible for two steps-up in basis, equating to 10% if held for 5 years, and another 5% if held for 7 years. The QOF election period ends on 12/31/2026. In order to hold a property for seven years and take advantage of the full 15% basis step-up, a QOF would need to make its investment by the end of 2019.

QUESTIONS OUTSTANDING

Math – There will be a substantial amount of calculation involved in quarterly filings to meet the requisite tests, and these calculations have not yet been outlined by the IRS. Further, there is currently not an exact equation for calculating the “substantial improvement” requirement.

State Taxes – States are moving slowly to indicate whether they will mirror the federal law, partially mirror it, or disregard it all together. Oregon appears to be leaning toward non-compliance, meaning a QOF investor will still have state tax liability on the capital gain they are intending to re-invest.

Raw Land – Both the tax code and the general consensus are still a bit fuzzy on the “substantial improvement” requirement for raw land. If a QOF is required to make improvements equal to or greater than the adjusted basis, it is unclear what that means for raw land which has an adjusted basis of zero.

In summary, the OZ provision in the new tax law appears to be achieving its intent, at least initially. It is spurring investment in the identified zones, and giving investors a vehicle to reinvest gains domestically, and locally. Rulemaking is slated to be complete by the end of 2019 but OZ experts agree that investors should stay close to the “middle of the fairway” – that is, if one invests in line with the spirit of the OZ provisions, then upcoming rulemaking will likely not bring many surprises. Read the full article at CompassCommercial.com/OZupdate.
